Mr. Jerome read a note written by Thaw during the last trial in which he spoke of a half hour's talk with Smith. The corroboration of the fact that he had talked with Smith. Mr. Jerome said, was a strong point in favor of the latter's testimony. Jerome picked up the revolver and demonstrated how Thaw had broken the gain and raised it over his head to allay the panic. The District-Attorney then carried Thaw through his various ensuing acts, apparently intending to show that Thaw was perfectly rational. "Is there any brainstorm, mania or depression, any other symptom of insanity in all this?" exclaimed Mr. Jerome. "Can you recall anything that showed insanity in all this? Gentlemen, the man he shot was the man who had wronged him, who had circulated vile stories about him, who had as his mistress the woman he loved, and let me say right here, that were it not for the sense of responsibility for a strict enforcement of the law, I could say to you that Stanford White deserved his death.
